I'm Gonna' Have To Draw The Line

-dogs in the house with me! I'll swear they are just like twins, they want out, they want in, the snow is too deep so they play in the road and Corky looks like a crazy man trying to round them up before they get run over by the snow plow. When they come in I have to find an old towel and dry them off before they will lay down in their new beds. I guess they don't want to get them dirty or wet since they are brand new.

I've tried to write for three days and each time I get comfy, cozy in my writing chair, I hear one bark. That's my cue that they either want IN or OUT! When I go to bed at night and get just about asleep, I'll hear those ears flop beside the bed. Guess what that means? Someone has to go potty before Momma can go to sleep. They are so comical to watch and even though I fuss about them constantly, I wouldn't take anything for them! It's funny how much a part of the family they truly are.

As the snow first began to fall, Rankin and Hooch would run and jump, romp and chase circles around the yard. Then it began to pile up and they made their way into the garage. When it climbed to ten inches on the yard stick, they decided in the house was the place to be. So here they are, bugging the daylight out of me! I'm trying to type with Hooch's head in my lap and Rankin leaned against the side of my chair, looking at me with big sad eyes, as if to say, "Come on, let's go play in the snow!"

The last time they went out for a potty break, they made it as far as the garage door and in unison they looked right...they looked left...then looked at each other and I'm sure the message they were giving one another was, "I can hold it, how about you?" They silently turned and climbed the steps back into the house and took their places on their beds. It doesn't appear that the snow will be melting anytime soon, so I'm sure I'll have the 'pleasure' of their company for several days to come. I really don't mind, but if they start asking for hot chocolate, I'm gonna have to draw the line!

Until next time.....
