Kash Daniel Chose All-SEC Linebacker Over All-SEC Beer Drinker

By LARRY VAUGHT

His first two years at Kentucky he played in all 26 games but linebacker Kash Daniel really was not much more than just a special teams player.

He admits it took some soul-searching to lead to the performance he had last season where he was third on the team with 84 tackles and ranked 24th in the SEC with 6.3 tackles per game.

"After my freshman and sophomore years I was kind of thinking beyond football at that point because I was just a special teams guy and didn't have priorities straight in my life about what I wanted to do," said Daniel, a U.S. Army All-American coming out of Paintsville in eastern Kentucky. "I was falling behind in school and a lot of things like that.

"It took a personal kick in the tail for me to say, 'Hey, you got a lot of people counting on you and wanting you to succeed. You have got to want it more than what other people do.' I changed my lifestyle, I changed my mindset of how I think."

Going into winter workouts after the 2017 season, Daniel told UK trainers he wanted to change and become an all-SEC linebacker — a very ambitious goal based on his first two years at UK.

Not everyone can kick himself in the tail to change. Sometimes a coach can inspire an athlete to do that, but not every athlete has the discipline or drive to undertake the type of change Daniel did.

"I had a decision to make. Do I want to be an all-SEC beer drinker or do I want to be an all-SEC linebacker? That's basically what it boiled down to," Daniel said.

Obviously, one of those is a lot easier to do than the other one. However, Daniel was recently named a pre-season all-SEC linebacker and plans to show he is that type of player.

"You have the path of least resistance (beer drinker) or the hard path (linebacker). I definitely chose the hard path and I am very thankful and grateful that I did that," Daniel, who had 11 tackles in last season's historic win at Florida, said. "Not only has it helped me on the football field but it will ultimately help me off the field as well.

"I went to work from there. It's all about keeping a healthy body, mind and spirit. Just going through that and being where I am now, it is pretty surreal but I did definitely envision it (being all-SEC and a team leader) after I made that switch (mentally)."

What makes Vince Marrow such a dynamic recruiter for Kentucky football?

"I have four kids of my own and a son who played at Alabama and won a national title," Marrow, UK's recruiting coordinator and tight ends coach, said. "You have to find out what kids' interest are and what their parents are interested in. Who are the decision makers in the kid's life? What ups and downs has he been through?"

"The way I relate is the same way I relate to my own kids. Kids can tell you what their generation is like. I ask kids who is that singing that song. Stuff like that. I am like a kid really. I love kids, I really do.

"My main thing is most kids we recruit are from inner cities, single mom, live with grandmother. I want to help change the direction of their life. Everybody is not going to play pro ball but I can help them get a degree and change their life."

He also doesn't bash a player who doesn't pick UK and tells fans not to, either. He points to Florida State transfer linebacker Xavier Peters, a one-time UK commit, as why he never burns bridges.

"I never talked to the kid again after he signed with Florida State, but when he wanted to leave to get back closer to home he knew he wanted to go to Kentucky. You just never know what might go full circle in recruiting," Marrow said. "If fans bash a kid after he goes somewhere else it can be a negative experience and he won't consider coming back.

"I didn't really know what this fan base was like when I came here. The majority are really good. There is serious football support here. This is a very unique place. That's one I reason I have never left (for a another job) along with just loving the guys here. I want to be part of winning and get this place really going. We're heading that way, but there's still more we are going to do."
